Analysis of chronic changes in sonic hedgehog, Indian hedgehog and patched protein in the aortic wall of rats with hereditary arterial tortuosity. The molecular events leading to aortic tortuosity and medial calcification in polycystic ovary syndrome have been documented. However, the initiating molecular events in the aortic wall have not been elucidated. Sonic hedgehog (Shh) is expressed in the aortic wall; however, it is unknown whether Shh stimulates vascular smooth muscle cell (VSMC) differentiation and calcification. The absence of hedgehog proteins in patched (PTC) mutant mice exhibits aortic tortuosity. Hence, this study sought to investigate the time course of changes in Shh and PTC proteins in aortic wall of hypophysectomized rats with hereditary arterial tortuosity compared with age-matched control rats. Immunofluorescence and Western blotting for Shh and PTC protein were performed on aortic sections at 1, 7, and 21 days after hypophysectomy. Our results demonstrated that the aortic wall of hypophysectomized rats had a significant decrease in Shh protein at 1 day after hypophysectomy but returned to the level of the control rats by 7 days. Shh and PTC protein levels remained significantly low in the aortic wall of hypophysectomized rats up to 21 days after hypophysectomy. These results support the hypothesis that decreased Shh and PTC protein levels may be responsible for initiating the molecular events leading to aortic tortuosity.
